"I'm sorry you feel so," replied her husband. "It would set my mind at ease in regard to the mortgage."
"Don't trouble yourself about that," said
Mrs. Bonfield, trying to speak cheerily;

They had two children, and his wife's health was not very good. If he should health was not very good. If he should die, what would become of them? This thought was perpetually haunting him, and taking away the pleasure of life.

Rayl, of Knoxille manner. the whole year. There had been sickness, wille, in his usual happy and forcible manner, loss of time, large doctor's bills, and one or two bad debts. Another baby had come, with the added care and expense.

Bonfield was less cheerful than on the previous New Year's eve. A shadow seemed to rest over him,

"I wish you could look at things more hopefully," said his wife. "He who feedeth the ravens, has us in His keeping as well. Why should we lose the blessings given us to-day, in fear of some evil to-morrow? We have our pleasant home and our darling children-good gifts and precious. Let us be happy in them."

Good gifts and precious they were to Bonfield. Few men loved wife and children with a tenderer, and more ansafish love. It was in the very depths of this love that anxiety was born. Fear lest he should be taken from them haunted him night and day. What was to become of them if he should die?

Alas for the next New Year's eve! It found the death-angel in Bonfield's house. A sudden illness baffled all the physician's skill, and the life on which so much depended went out, and left sorrow and darkness, and desolation of spirit behind.

"What is become of his poor wife and children?" was the anxious question that passed from lip to lip among friends and neighbors. They had not a relative in the place—no one on whom they had any natural claim for help or support. It was this for discussion: "Responsibilities of teachers," that had made the husband and father so anxious about them, and so carnest to get his home paid for. In the year which had just closed, only a hundred dollars of the mortgage had been canceled, and there still remained eight hundred dollars due. by alli This mortgage was in the hands of a man who would not scruple to rob the widow

A letter! When she comprehended that, Mrs. Bonfield's interest was awakened. She took it from her child's hand, and opening it, read a few lines, and then let it fall to the floor. But quickly and eagerly catching it up, she held it in wild excitement close to her eyes, then let it fall again, and furying her face in her hands, sat very still while tears fell in large drops through
